International NGOs and State Capacity: Facilitator or Destroyer? (with Matthew DiGiuseppe and Amanda Murdie)

Abstract: Do development international non-governmental organizations (INGOs) facilitate or destroy the bureaucratic capacity of the states in which they operate? The literature is split on this question. Some scholars argue that development INGOs weaken state capacity by delivering social services that the government is supposed to provide. Others argue that by increasing a country's domestic demand for improved human rights, development INGOs improve a government's capacity to fulfill them. In this paper, we show that the effect of development INGOs on state capacity depends upon whether a state is democratic or non-democratic. In our cross-sectional time-series analysis, we find that development INGO presence has a significant positive relationship with state capacity in democracies, but no relationship with state capacity in non-democratic states. These findings help to explain the inconsistent claims in the existing INGO literature and are also relevant for development INGOs and the policymakers that support them.

The Benefits of Bad Behavior: Explaining the Local Performance of Global Governors

Abstract: When do global governors perform at the local level? International Organizations (IOs), International Non-Governmental Organizations (INGOs), and bilateral aid donors increasingly operate at the local level, implementing projects that aim to change the behavior of domestic institutions. While scholarship on global governance has begun to examine the performance of these actors, it has not yet examined the heterogeneous behavior of their country offices. Rationalist explanations assume that IOs, INGOs, and bilateral aid donors perform when they respond to the incentives created by their principals. Constructivist scholars focus on the failure of these organizations to perform, citing the influence of bureaucratic pathologies and practices. Through the examination of 28 cases of organizational performance in the hard case of international peacebuilding, this article argues that global organizations perform at the local level only when they create informal accountability routines that undermine both their bureaucracies and their principals. In other words, 'bad behavior' by individual staff is necessary for good performance.

Aiding Peace: Foreign Aid Donor Behavior During War-to-Peace Transitions in the DRC, Sudan, South Sudan, and Nepal (with Michael Findley)

Abstract: Despite prominent claims by international aid organizations that they run conflict-sensitive operations, little is known about how the international community behaves during war-to-peace transitions. The broader aid literature shows that geostrategic alliances influence aid donors' initial aid allocation decisions. Although this type of strategic interest helps to explain why donors may provide aid to friends over foes, it does not tell us how donors behave once they have decided to provide aid to a country. We contend that aid behavior is also influenced by donors' desire to mitigate poverty and human suffering and build peace, which is distinct from geostrategic alliances and the relative need of the recipient country. If we are correct, during war-to-peace transitions, cooperation and conflict among warring parties on the ground should shape aid allocation. Moreover, donor organizational flexibility on the ground should moderate the location and amount of aid. Using sub-nationally-geocoded foreign aid information, and relying on extensive interviews in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Sudan, South Sudan, and Nepal, we examine the extent to which these factors encourage or discourage substantial changes in foreign aid donors' development and humanitarian assistance. Our results show that while both conflictual and cooperative events influence changes in the foreign aid of all donors, the direction of the shift is shaped by the degree of strategic interest and organizational flexibility donors possess. Within the population of donors, those with strategic interest in the particular country make larger shifts – both negative and positive – in subnational foreign aid allocation in response to cooperative events but smaller shifts in response to conflict events. Organizational flexibility, on the other hand, leads to donors to more targeted responses, rewarding cooperative behavior with increased aid and responding to conflict by decreasing aid. This analysis is a first step towards a comprehensive coding and analysis of foreign aid dynamics during war-to-peace transitions.

Contracting Sovereignty: How Weak States Reclaim their Authority to Govern

Abstract: Dozens of International Organizations (IOs), International Non-Governmental Organizations (INGOs), and States intervene in each fragile and conflict-affected country to save lives and build the foundations for sustainable peace and development. International relations literature assumes that once these global governors exercise, possess, or assert their authority to intervene in a country's domestic territory, they do not have to renegotiate this authority (Lake 2010). This paper argues that a conflict-affect state renegotiates the authority of IOs, INGOs, and intervening states regularly through formal contracts and procedures. IOs, INGOs, and intervening states require the agreement and cooperation of the 'host' government to import procured goods, hire staff, establish their offices, and implement new strategies and programs. Through these daily interactions, the 'host' government reclaims some of its sovereign authority from these intervening organizations. The maintenance of contracts therefore enables supposedly weak states to wield significant power over the actors in global governance that operate on their territory. Contrary to claims in the international relations literature that international interveners impose their agenda on weak states, this paper uses detailed ethnographic fieldwork and archival research to show that conflict-affected states are increasingly using contractual arrangements to exercise significant power over international actors intervening on their territory.

The Micro-Dynamics of Peacebuilding: A Quasi-Experimental Spatial Impact Evaluation in Burundi (with Michael Findley and Daniel Walker)

Abstract: When does international peacebuilding assistance have the desired sub-national effect in post-conflict countries? The literature on UN peace operations argues that the presence of robust and well-resourced UN peacekeeping operations helps to prevent some post-conflict countries from falling back into war, although countries that have experienced civil war still have a 57 percent rate of recidivism. The literature on international aid argues that more aid combined with a particular mixture of policy reforms will help to stabilize post-conflict contexts, but does not tell us how this mixture comes about. Based on the findings from our 2013 quasi-experimental impact evaluation of US$ 44 million that the UN Peacebuilding Fund allocated to Burundi between 2007 and 2013, we argue that the sub-national effect of international aid to post-conflict countries is due, in part, to how activities are implemented. Our quasi-experimental spatial study, combining a large household level survey with almost 200 semi-structured interviews, shows that the same organization with the same type of project can be successful in one location, but fail in another, in part because of how individual staff carry out its implementation. We thus identify the conditions under which peacebuilding assistance helps or hurts, which moves away from probabilistic accounts that ignore the important role played by project implementation and the individual staff who carry it out.
